INTRODUCTION

Language is the primary means of human communication, in which words play a central role not only in transmitting information but also in creating complex layers of meaning and stylistic effects. Lexical choice is the conscious process of selecting the most appropriate and effective word or expression in a particular communicative situation. This process is not merely a substitution of lexical units; rather, it is a crucial factor that determines the overall tone, style, emotional load, and even the impact of a text on the reader or listener. The role of lexical choice in shaping stylistic effects is an important area of research in linguistics, and its place and mechanisms within the modern communicative paradigm require in-depth analysis. This scientific article aims to provide a comprehensive and systematic analysis of lexical choice and its significance in creating stylistic effects. It examines the theoretical foundations of lexical choice through concepts such as denotation, connotation, and register, highlighting the stylistic potential of lexical units. Furthermore, the study explores the influence of communicative situations, context, and cultural factors on lexical choice, as well as the mechanisms through which stylistic effects are created. The article also analyzes the artistic and functional aspects of lexical choice in literary texts and its role in enhancing communicative effectiveness. This research contributes to a deeper understanding of the complex mechanisms of language, particularly the subtleties of word selection, and helps to develop effective and expressive communication strategies. Understanding the stylistic potential of lexical choice is of practical importance not only for linguists and literary scholars but also for writers, journalists, translators, and the general public.

RESEARCH METHODOLOGY

This scientific study is aimed at a comprehensive analysis of lexical choice and its role in creating stylistic effects. Its methodological foundation is based on a systematic and integrated approach. The main objective of the research is to theoretically substantiate the stylistic potential of lexical units in the Uzbek language, including their denotative and connotative meanings, registers, communicative situations, context, and cultural factors, and to illustrate these aspects through practical examples. [1] To achieve this objective, several tasks were defined: to identify the theoretical foundations of lexical choice and its significance in linguistics; to analyze the role of denotative and connotative meanings of lexical units in forming stylistic effects based on previous research; to examine the specific features of lexical choice within different speech registers and their sociolinguistic determinants; to investigate the influence of communicative situations, context, and cultural factors on lexical choice; and to analyze the mechanisms of creating stylistic effects through lexical choice, including the formation of stylistic devices such as metaphor, metonymy, and epithet. [2] The object of the research is lexical units in the Uzbek language and their use in various communicative situations, while the subject of the research is the process of lexical choice, its mechanisms in creating stylistic effects, its functions, and its role in enhancing communicative effectiveness. The research materials include samples of Uzbek literature, both prose and poetry, as well as publicistic texts such as newspaper and journal articles and online publications. These materials allow the researcher to demonstrate how lexical choice manifests in different communicative situations and genres. When selecting texts, attention is paid to the author's stylistic individuality, genre characteristics, and stylistic richness. Several scientific methods are employed in the research. The descriptive method is used to identify the semantic layers, stylistic features, and contexts of lexical units [3] The comparative-analytical method is applied to compare lexical units with similar denotative meanings but different connotative and stylistic effects. Contextual analysis helps determine the functional load of lexical units within a given communicative situation. Stylistic analysis focuses on identifying stylistic devices such as metaphor, metonymy, epithet, and simile created through lexical choice. Semantic analysis explores the denotative and connotative meanings of words, while sociolinguistic analysis examines the influence of registers and social factors on lexical choice. In addition, inductive and deductive approaches are used in combination, allowing the research to move from general theoretical principles to specific examples and vice versa [4] This comprehensive methodological approach enables the study to reveal the complex and multifaceted mechanisms of lexical choice, encompassing linguistic, cultural, social, and cognitive aspects.

DISCUSSION AND RESULT

The analysis shows that lexical choice plays a very important role in shaping the stylistic effect of a text. Even when words have similar denotative meanings, they can create different impressions depending on their connotation and the context in which they are used. This means that word choice is not random, but a conscious process that directly affects how the message is understood by the reader or listener. One of the key findings of the study is that appropriate lexical choice helps to maintain stylistic consistency [5] Different types of texts require different vocabulary. For example, formal and academic texts usually include neutral and precise words, while informal or creative texts often use more expressive and emotional language. If the vocabulary does not match the situation, the text may sound unnatural or less effective. This idea is supported by Simpson (2004), who explains that stylistic meaning is closely connected with lexical choice and that the selection of words influences the reader's interpretation of the text. According to him, writers use lexical choices as a stylistic tool to achieve specific communicative goals, such as persuading, informing, or entertaining the audience. Another important result is related to the role of context and cultural factors. Words may carry additional meanings, associations, or emotional оттенки depending on the cultural background and communicative situation. Because of this, lexical choice helps not only to deliver information but also to express attitudes, emotions, and cultural identity. [6] In literary texts, this can be clearly seen in the use of stylistic devices such as metaphors, epithets, and similes, which make the text more vivid and engaging. Furthermore, the analysis shows that effective lexical choice improves the overall quality of communication. It makes the text clearer, more expressive, and easier to understand. A well-chosen word can attract the reader's attention, create a strong impression, and help the writer achieve the main purpose of the text. In general, the results confirm that lexical choice is a key factor in creating stylistic effect. It influences not only the meaning of the text but also its tone, clarity, and emotional impact. Therefore, careful and thoughtful word selection is essential for successful communication in different contexts.

CONCLUSION

This article provides a comprehensive and systematic analysis of the central role of lexical choice in creating stylistic effects. The research demonstrates that the process of word selection is not limited to conveying denotative meanings but is closely connected with connotative meanings, speech registers, context, and cultural factors, all of which determine the tone, expressiveness, and artistic value of a text. Lexical choice is a complex linguistic, cultural, social, and cognitive phenomenon through which stylistic devices such as metaphor and metonymy are effectively formed. The findings of this study contribute to a deeper understanding of the multifaceted mechanisms of lexical choice, the development of effective communication strategies, and the full realization of the artistic potential of language. Furthermore, it provides a solid theoretical and practical foundation for future linguistic research in the field of lexical stylistics.
